Geology and Earthquakes

All changes of elevations, whether of land or of sea bottom, are caused by steam power generated fifteen or twenty miles downward. Beyond and below this comparatively thin crust of twenty miles' thickness no movement or quaking ever occurs. But the movements spring out of lower regions of the outer thin crust and are transmitted through the agency of molten rock, account for the dislocations and faults of the upper crust, the crumpling, wrinkling and all other phenomena associated in mountain districts, including volcanic eruptions and the subsidence or elevation of coast lines.

This new theory of the cause of earthquakes and volcanoes enables geologists to account in a most satisfactory manner for the phenomena studied in their science, enabling them to read in the strata of the earth the history of our globe, to account for disturbances of the present and to speak confidently of the future. There is no hope whatever that earthquakes and volcanoes will ever cease. As long as there is heat beneath and water above the surface, the world will, from time to time, experience eruptions and quakes. The foregoing physical conditions are permanent, and the world will know no surcease of these afflictions until the ocean dries up and the earth becomes cold. There is this consolation, however, that no immediate repetition of an earthquake or a volcanic outburst will follow with a generation or more. The relief having come to the strain of the interior pressure, a long time will generally follow before steam will accumulate sufficient to cause another eruption or quake.—Kansas City Star.
